While reservations I have about the quality of the Fujifilm X-Trans RAW conversion are based on my personal experience, I do believe Adobe will eventually nail the rendering of such raw files. There are some minor things I still encounter - Johnny is kind enough to point out in the Silkipix vs. Lightroom RAW conversion section. Overall, I was impressed by the feel of Lightroom 5 and how it treated my RAW images. It loads up much quicker than Lightroom 4 and saved the last preview to a file for quick undoing. I will continue using Lightroom 5 for now. I believe that with the pending acquisition of Adobe by $3.4 billion Microsoft, the landscape of RAW digital photography is as good as it can get. The addition of Lens Blur and Advanced Sharpening controls in Lightroom 5 means that you are able to make much more fine-tuned edits to fine-tune your images in postprocessing. There is also a new, non-destructive photo filter called HDR Photo in Lightroom 5, which enhances images as a complete composite. The "Create HDR from Photos" function in Lightroom 5 enables non-destructive editing, including adjustments of exposure, brightness and contrast. With the HDR Photo filter, you can shoot several frames, then combine them all in Photoshop or other tools. You can then change the lighting or other photographic qualities, and composite them all together several times. Using the selective removal tool in Lightroom 5, you can then get rid of small areas of pixels (if you like) and create a more pleasing final image. While the HDR Photo filter is non-destructive, you may start to notice that you cannot hit the 'save' button until you have completed the photostory, rather than saving sub-files. This way you are always sure that you have all settings.

Yes, you read that right. We aren't just talking about seeing your photos in a web browser of course. We are talking about virtual web applications where you can edit those images you see in your browser directly inside Photoshop itself. There are a few different reasons that make this possible, all of which are related to web technologies. First off, the basic idea behind web applications and web pages is to make it easier for any developer to write software in a platform independent manner. Adobe essentially created a programming language that allows developers to be a lot more efficient in packaging and delivering their applications and even modify it later if they have to. Before this, developers were forced to either build programs in a language like Java and had to use plugins or write in a language like C++ and use some kind of browser engine. Now, applications can be written in any language you choose. In the case of Photoshop, Adobe has chosen to make it possible to use C++ and be able to distribute your creations in their own ".webapp" format to make it easier and more efficient for developers to produce applications for the web. These.webapp files can even be edited and use later on in addition to the web and desktop software. The second reason for the technology is that to be able to compile your applications to the web, you must package them and actually deliver them to the web. You can do this using a programming language like C++, but today's browsers can't execute that code. e3d0a04c9c
