I recently got my A7Sii, and I'm having a real problem getting any good images other than correctly color balanced. The problem stems from the fact that the camera's default settings are very weak, and the stock white balance is usually baked in, so I end up clamping the RGB somewhat on the white balance, which results in over-saturated greens and yellows. After trying a bunch of settings, I finally found one that seems to work better with both the green and yellow filters and the lens hood, but the ramp is barely visible, and there's chromatic aberration everywhere. The color contrast sucks, and the ramp is barely visible. The only way to erase the flange distance (the distance of the top of the lens from the floor) is to shade the front the way the camera allows - completely flat. I only need to do this once, but I've convinced myself to keep fiddling with the camera for no big reason. Why is that I cannot just use the flash exposure correction, or even the flash in-camera measure? I know many people who use the A7sii only for shooting flash, and they're not giving that one the credit it deserves. I just downloaded this and I am loving it! I had used PS for years and it was the only thing I thought was holding me back. After getting some amazing photographs from my a7sii, I was only missing Photoshop. I didn't forget about it but my computer wasn't ready to take the hits that this will produce. I love editing I just couldn't be happier. I have noticed a lot of people ask about getting a good RAW converter and so far I even saw a lot of good reviews on it and now I understand why. I looked into Lightroom but I couldn't find a way to really edit the individual layers because every time I would change a layer it would remove the previous layer entirely. This makes me want to cry.

There are also numerous ways to combine multiple images using content-based modes such as HDR and Photomerge. Adobe Camera Raw is an exciting new feature that has been missing from most of the Elements workflow since previous versions.
